The Commission should consider the requirements for Children's Educational Television, especially concerning commercial broadcasting. Many of the regulations outlined in these rules are no longer necessary, as most Americans are shifting to streaming services and other methods to access children's programming. I would suggest, however, that the rules for non-commercial stations (such as PBS members) remain unchanged, allowing low-income families to continue enjoying the same educational programming that children and families have relied on for decades. More commercial TV stations have to push around children's programming to make room for local news and sports programming and see Children's programming as a burden. More and more Americans tune in to these TV stations for such news and sports programming and don't care for children's programming. Therefore, the commission should strongly look at these requirements, and remove them as necessary.
